To whom it may concern,

It seems, to me at least, an eyebrow plucking approach to a whole-of-person problem.

I fail to see how the proposed trajectory amounts to a review. Little more than “what is there that we can modify to make it look like we’re doing something?”.

A review, in our experience, builds on the assumptions that nothing exists and assumes a ground-floor-up approach.

What, in the light of what we now know, are we going to need, when will we need it by, and what is the most efficient cost effective solution for the end user.

The update of websites, the creation of mobile applications, and fringe discussions do not nearly achieve review status.

Nothing that exceeds tuning of the status quo to fulfil election promises conforms to governance.

If it’s too hard, why bother doing it at all ?
